THE NORTH AMERICAN MODEL FOR WILDLIFE MANAGEMENT IN THE UNITED STATES COMPARED TO THE EUROPEAN MODEL

14. 10. 2016, 19:30 | FSS, aula

The North American Model for Wildlife Management has been utilized by natural resource management agencies in the United States for nearly a century. The American view of natural resource protection and wildlife management was intentionally created differently than the model which still exists in Europe. In North America, all wildlife belongs to the government and is managed by the states and federal government for the conservation of the wildlife and utilization by all the citizens when possible of surplus game. Hunting is a privilege open to everyone, not just wealthy landowners or select hunting club members, as in the case of the European model. In the western United States where a majority of the lands are owned and managed by various state and federal agencies, the model has not only proven successful for the management of traditional game species but also the recovery and protection of many sensitive species and their habitats. In America, the way wildlife is managed depends on where the wildlife is found at a certain time and leads to some very complex discussions, especially about large carnivores.

Over the past twenty years, the United States Federal Government in cooperation with local and state governments have cooperated together with native tribes and private organizations to recover large carnivore species such as the gray wolf (Canis lupus) and grizzly bear (Ursus arctos horribilis). The success of the recovery, protection, and management of these species has been due to a cooperative approach to addressing biological and societal concerns. Because of the different types of state and federal land ownerships involved the process has been very complex and even disputed by many.
